

Talent is generally considered to be a personal gift or skill, possessed by relatively few, fortunate people. However, almost everyone has some degree of talent, or 'innate ability' in some particular field of endeavour; though few people are aware of their 'talents', or are able to make proper use of their talent as a result of that lack of awareness.